Introduction

Two years ago, RACVIAC - Centre for Security Cooperation and Netherlands Defence College (NDC) introduced the Human Resources Management Studies as a completely new field of activities for RACVIAC and its members. Both parties recognized the adaptation of the Human Resources Management System as the crucial element and ultimate prerequisite for successful and overall completion of any armed forces reform process.

At the moment, the highest level of the ongoing change is the process of globalization, which is characterized by the integration of all aspects including security systems. Countries belonging to the existing "globalization core" must adapt their armed forces to the new security challenges, including new types of missions where they are mostly deployed out of their own national boundaries on tasks, which now by their definition include Small Intensity Conflict Operations and security coalitions. Regional countries without exception decided to join this "core". Thus, they have chosen the all-volunteer forces as the ideal type of military organization for the global era.

In the case of creation of the all-volunteer forces, reorganization of the Human Resources Management System must be conducted before any major change occurs, or the stability of the national security system can be seriously disturbed. The majority of regional countries used to have or still have predominately compulsory service force. Building the modern expeditionary all-volunteer armed force requires significant changes in the Human Resources Management systems, not just due to drastic shift in the primary source of personnel. Additionally, there are some new issues generated by the new sociological and economical aspects of these changes. Unfortunately, so-called process of "professionalization" is often simplified and equalized with the process of termination of the compulsory service. The entire process is far more complex and the main goal for the Workshop was to provide corresponding insight picture, i.e. to offer the representatives of the invited countries an insight into the personnel and organizational aspects of the transition from the conscript-oriented Armed Forces to expeditionary, professional Armed Forces. These were the starting points for the creation of the corresponding workshop programme.

Activity Facilitators

The event was planned, organized and executed as the joint event between RACVIAC - Centre for Security Cooperation and the Netherlands Defence College, Division for Special and International Courses.

Conclusions and Recommendations

The Workshop is a direct answer to the requirements of the current process of the armed forces transformation in the countries of the region, from the system in which military service is a dominantly a legal obligation into the system that is based on all-volunteer military service. NDC and RACVIAC have recognized the importance of the current reform of human resources management system as a key factor and prerequisite for the success of the aforementioned reform of the armed forces in the context of the so-called "professionalization". This adjustment is particularly important for the countries in the region trying to finalize modernization of their military organizations and to finish the process of their own European security integration. The Kingdom of the Netherlands, as a country that underwent similar process in mid 90s, has attained significant experience in this field and from the very beginning displayed notable willingness to share it with the countries of the region. Thus, Netherlands Defence College was the natural choice for RACVIAC to become its strategic partner in the field of Human Resources Management studies. This unique and successful cooperation should continue in the future providing our region with even more opportunities to share mutual experiences and develop existing knowledge.
